A Terrible Catastrophe Recalled.

One night recently Deenis Mack, enginear on a switch engine in the yards of the Lackawanna Iron and Coal Company in Scranton, ran his engine into the engine house. As he was to go on duty again at 1 o'clock the next morning be lay down in the cab of his engine to sleep until that time. Just before I o'clock workmen in the yard were startled by a great crash at the engine house, which is a frame building. Looking in the direction of the house they saw one side of it give way and Mack's engine come tearing out of the breach. The engine ran a short distance over the ground and then toppled over down an embankment twenty feet high. It rolled over and over in the descent, and was badly wrecked. The workmen knew that Mack was on the engine, and expected to find him crushed to death in the debris. They found him fast in the wreck, and although he was held so Manufacturers of Conductor Jud that part of the road. Conductor Jud Brown had orders to lie on the switch at Mast Hope until fast express train No. 3, west bound, passed. James Griffin was the engineer of the freight train. As the express train approached the station at midnight, running thirty-five miles an hour, Conductor Brown was horrified to see his train pulling out on the main track. Griffin's engine reached the main track directly in front of the express, and a terrific collision was the result. The cars on the express train were piled on top of one another and caught fire. Many passengers were killed outright. A dozen others were held in the wreck and burned alive. The depot caught fire and was destroyed. Griffin discovered the situation in time to jump depot caught fire and was destroyed. Griffin discovered the situation in time to jump from his engine. He fled, but afterward surrendered himself and was longed in the Pike county jail. He was tried for manslaughter in September, 1869. He was defended by the late Chief Justice George W. Woodward. It was proved on the trial that he had been on duty twenty-four hours without slesp, and the point made by the defence was that while waiting on the switch he was overcome by the strain and fell asleep. He was partially awakened by the approaching train, and pulled open the theotile of his engine before he knew what he was doing. A sympathetic jury acquitted him, against the charge of Judge Barrett to convict, and were publicly censured by the court. The disaster made the name of Mast Hope so notorious all over the country fact. Mast Hope so notorious all over the country that the railroad company changed the name of the station to Pine Grove, which it retained until a few weeks ago, when it was
